Book: "Parenting plans outline how a child's time will be split between two households, and they are required in divorce settlements. The best plans include much more than just a division of time. The more detailed a plan is, the more potential conflicts it can squash. Beyond the basics of where a child will stay, and how he or she will get from one household to the other, consider how the child will spend holidays, family birthdays, religious practices and travel. Also, include agreement on issues such as at what age a child is old enough to go out alone with friends. These things help to keep children's lives running as consistently as possible."
